The slope tells us how much the predicted output value will increase or decrease for each one-unit increase in the input variable. If the slope is positive, the output value goes up as the input goes up, and if the slope is negative, the output value goes down as the input goes up. This means that the slope shows the direct relationship between the input variable and the model's prediction.